But there is another and stronger reason against this procedure. And the reason is to be found in bars 209 to 207. In this Festival Ending the moving pedal-bass is consciously used, with full knowledge of the pedal-board-composition, to make it immensely effective. And it is used there with much more direction and purpose than it is in bars 78 to 83. If, then, we make our big splash in the earlier bars with our first and second violins and string-combination, we shall be compelled to repeat this in the same way when we come to the Festival Ending. And that is an orchestral impossibility. Probably in this particular work we shall not be able to use our third octave of strings at all. At any rate it is quite certain that the musical compromise necessary of lowering and so the raising of consideration in bars 78 to 83 is the real one. In the piano score these ten bars accordingly to the present plan that I have suggested above. And so does, he may be sure that for these ten bars the score is the more effective, the more, but equally sure that from the point of view of the general orchestral propriety of the Festival, this effectiveness is inadvisable. I do not intend to give any space to the discussion of what may not appear as a very important question, because it is just these preliminary considerations that are vital in scoring choral music. The reader can now turn to the details of their orchestration: (1) The combination of strings, wood-wind (without flutes), and horns at bar (2) The moving bass, in two octaves only, on bassoons, cellos, and basses. (3) The same entry of the heavy brass at the end of bar 83, with the simultaneous addition of flutes, and the jumping of the first violins into their upper octave. (4) The addition of the drums placo for the first time while the chorus is singing. (5) The dynamic marking of the brass, and particularly of the drums with regard to the rest of the orchestra. (6) The fact that, though the tone-scheme of bar 78 is considerably lowered as compared with that of bar 5, we arrive in bar 85 at an appreciably larger sound-mass than that in its corresponding bar, 12. These two latter bars, 12 and 85, should be carefully compared.
